Hyatt streets, Rosehill addition, was struck by lightning, the bolt striking the east end of the building, tearing off the cornice and passing down through the interior, taking for a part of its track the post of the bed in which Mr. Dunsworth was sleeping, passing within a foot of his head. His vest and trousers, which were hanging on the bedpost, were badly scorched and the glass in a picture frame hanging on the wall shattered into small fragments. Mr. Dunsworth was shocked for a moment only, but has felt no ill effects of consequence since. There were six others in the house, none of whom were effected. What became of the bolt after it traveled down the bedpost, which is of iron, is somewhat of a puzzle, as it left no trace of its passage, farther than Mr. Dunsworth, who, when he recovered from the shock, feared that everyone in the house except himself had been killed, was happy to find that the extent of the damage was a shattered cornice, a scorched vest, trousers and a pair of suspenders, but he is not anxious to have the experience repeated. A bolt of lightning passing within a foot of a man's head is rather a close call.—Brookfield Gazette.
